Chapter 11: Privacy and Data Security

Understanding Data Privacy

When you go online, you leave behind bits of information, like your name, address, and even the things you like or dislike. For example, when you join a social media site, you might share photos or thoughts that others can see. Sometimes, companies collect this information to sell products or target ads specially for you. It's important to recognize that not all websites and apps handle your information carefully. A good way to think about data privacy is like locking the doors and windows to your house. You wouldn't leave your home open for anyone to
